

NORTHERN EXPOSURE

Communal kitchens and bathrooms aside, there's much to love about a striking new back-country hut that opened in August in Northern Norway, just 60 kilometres shy of the Arctic Circle in Helgeland. Set steps from the Okstindbreen glacier (the eighth largest glacier on the Norwegian mainland) in Hemnes, Rabothytta was named after French glaciologist Charles Rabot, but is distinctly Scandinavian in design. Oslo firm Jarmund/Vignæs looked to the surrounding Okstindan mountains for the hut's neutral-volume silhouette, which resembles a glacial rock and blends sharp angles and trapezoidal chimneys to mirror the topography. The neutral colour scheme of the interior is meant to be brightened by the colorful hiking gear of the 31 guests who can overnight in the hut's seven bedrooms. Visitors are 1.5 hours by foot from the nearest road - or, during snowier times, roughly three hours on skis, when arriving there is particularly welcome. rabothytta.no

In honour of the 60th anniversary of its revolutionary M-system, Leica has reissued the classic M60, and fittingly stripped back the camera to the bare essentials - just four features, no display - leaving shot quality entirely in the hands of the photographer. Created by Audi Design, the 600-piece limited edition is both a collector's item, wreathed in timeless elegance, and a sleek, simple camera that reclaims the essence of photography. leica.com
